IRISH SUPERSTITIONS.

The Death Coach and The Fairy Horse and Great Black Bird.

The tide of civilization and education urging over Ireland, and in towns and large villages steam and electricity, mo-tors and bicycles, libraries and newspapers have dealt a deathblow to many picturesque old customs and romantic egends, but amid the wide stretches of bog in the wild glens and mountain passes, and along the stormy Atlantic oast ancient rites and myths linger.

No wonder strange superstitions linger in the scattered hamlets by sea or in the lonely cabins on the rock islands round the iron coast, for on winter nights, when the mighty surges break thund ing against the towering cliffs and the storm wind wails weirdly through the hollow coverns and ivied ruins, where the deserted fortresses of the powerful chieftains of hygone days look down on the foaming waves and the cry of the gulis and curiew echoes over rock abores and across wide lengths and estuaries, ne might well fancy that the sounds were the voices of giants or wizards loomed for their sins to wunder forever ound this coast, the mournful wail of the "bambee" or of "the White Lady of Marvelous Strength of the Father of Alexandre Dumas.

My father was twenty-four at the time of enlisting and as handsome a young fellow as could be found anywhere.

His free colonial life had developed his strength and prowess to an extraordinary degree. He was a veritable American horse lad, a cowboy. His skill with gun and pistol was the envy of St. Georges and Junot, and his Friday taken to Windsor to begin his muscular strength became a proverb in the army. More than once he amused himself haths riding school by passing The business of the Rutland railroad under a beam, grasping it with his has increased steadily, and in 1907, for arms and lifting his horse between his the first time in the history of the road legs. A few years later the gallant hussar was a brigadier general and performing feats of valor which carned him the title of "the Horatius Cocies of the Tyrol." Best of all we like the son's description of Horatius' storming of Mont Cenis:

The climbers reached the plateau. Although it was a dark night, the long line of soldiers, clothed in bine uniforms, could have been perceived outlined against the snow from the fort. But my father had foreseen this contingency; each man had a cotton cap and a shirt rolled up in his knapsack. This was the ordinary dress my father adopted at night when he

The men began climbing the pallendes as soon as they reached them; but, thanks to my father's herculean strength, he thought of a bester and quieter way-namely, to take each man by the sent of his trousers and the collar of his coat and throw him over the palisades. The snow would break the fall and also deaden the noise. Surprised out of their sleep and seeing the French soldiers in their midst without knowing how they bad come there, the Piedmontese hardly offered any resistance. - From "My Memoirs," by Alexandre Dumas, Translated by E.
